and nonbiological deterioration processes are limited, wood can deteriorate. over long periods, microbes that are able to grow in adverse conditions degrade the wood, and various compounds, such as salts, cause a slow chemical deterioration. most, if not all, historic and archaeological woods have been affected to some degree by degradation. research on biodeterioration of laboratory wood, 1987-1992 - wood deterioration. the major current wood preservatives— creosote, pentachlorophenol, and inorganic arsenicals—are broad-spectrum biocides that can pose a serious threat to the environment, especially during the treating step. some of these chemicals have already been banned or restricted in some countries. effects of fire, insect, and - us forest service - effects of fire, insect, and pathogen damage on wood quality of dead and dying western conifers is being considered. although it was prepared specifically for oregon and washing-ton forests, much of the information is relevant for other areas. the effects of fire on understory plants and fuel loads were discussed by brown and smith (2000). wood decay in houses - usda - wood decay is caused by minute plants called fungi. these plants consist of microscopic threads that are visible to the naked eye only when many of them occur together (fig. 1). but it is easy to see the fruiting bodies of fungi, from which their spores are distributed (fig. 2). some fungi merely discolor wood, but decay fungi destroy the fiber. united states lumber recovery and deterioration of beetle ... -
